Abstract: The present paper approaches the field of behavioral sciences by conceptually discussing examples of non-normative behavior. A series of past experiments are brought into light in order to underline that it lies in the human nature to cope with present and past events in a subjective, obedient manner, influenced by group inhibitions, social roles and the dynamic character and the haste of today's world. We conclude that the decision making process – independent of the domain of expertise – is altered by the occurrence of the anomalies of the human behavior.
