Abstract: Sustainable development has arisen in response to the emergence of the global environmental issues and natural resources' crisis, particularly those related to energy. To substantiate the sustainable development strategies, at every level, national or local, it is necessary to assess the socio-economic system. One of the basic components of social capital is workforce analysis. In this paper the authors have proposed to present research results on the evolution of employment in a community in order to substantiate the sustainable development strategy.

Keywords: Sustainable development, strategy, workforce.
